This invention relates generally to flow control valves for use in household plumbing systems and, more particularly, to a uniquely configured and constructed solenoid actuated ball valve to regulate the flow of water or the like therethrough.

2. Description of the Prior Art Generally speaking, ball valves are well known in the art. Typically, they are used in household plumbing systems to control the flow of water or the like, especially when it is desired to shut off or restrict the flow of water through a specific passage under emergency conditions. A typical ball valve comprises a cylinder or housing and a spherical valve plug positioned therein which is movable between open and closed positions and which is further movable between opened and closed positions by way of the well known solenoid actuated mechanisms. In the open position, the ball plug is positioned to permit passage therethrough of the water or the like which is being controlled by the ball valve. In the closed position, the ball plug is positioned to prevent any and all flow therethrough. While many different approaches have been taken by others in this field, there is still room for improvement, particularly with respect to the ball valve's efficiency, simplicity and manufacturing cost. The subject invention provides a unique ball valve which is specifically designed to overcome the shortcomings of the prior art ball valves. UNPUBLISHED UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS keygen software. The Neuroticism-Stress Response Interface (NSRI) and hypothalamic pituitary adrenocortical axis activity in women with premenstrual syndrome. Little evidence has been found to suggest that the mechanisms involved in the pathogenesis of premenstrual syndrome (PMS) are psychosomatic rather than somatic. Higher levels of neuroticism are associated with a greater propensity to respond to stressors with increased cortisol. Neuroticism has been linked to aspects of premenstrual symptomatology. Given that PMS is a disorder of extreme emotionality, this study examined the relationship of neuroticism to cortisol, diurnal variation of cortisol, and the hypothalamic pituitary adrenocortical (HPA) axis in women with moderate PMS. Although the HPA axis is known to be involved in PMS, very little research has been done to examine the relationship between cortisol and other more emotion-related factors, such as neuroticism, in PMS. Twenty women with moderate PMS completed a 36-h daily diary and the Eating Attitudes Test (EAT) and completed the NEO Five Factor Inventory. Saliva samples were collected every 15 min over two 24-h periods on two days. The HPA axis was evaluated by examining the diurnal variation of cortisol and the cortisol awakening response (CAR) and the relationship between basal and diurnal cortisol. Differences in EAT scores were found between subjects with high and low neuroticism scores. Despite this, no differences in the CAR between the groups were found. No differences in basal, peak or diurnal cortisol were found between groups. These findings indicate that regardless of neuroticism, women with PMS have comparable HPA axis activity, as demonstrated by the absence of diurnal variation, and lack of differences in cortisol morning and evening peaks and levels.
